There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the quality of the work environment. This is reflected in the fact that many companies are now investing in employee training and development programs. These programs are designed to help employees develop the skills and knowledge they need to succeed in their jobs. By investing in employee training and development, companies can improve the quality of their work environment and increase their productivity.

Quadrant 1: "Doers." These people are the most effective. They are the ones who get things done. They are the ones who are always on top of their game. They are the ones who are always looking for ways to improve themselves and their work. They are the ones who are always taking initiative. They are the ones who are always going above and beyond. They are the ones who are always making a difference.

Finger Print Forgery

Criminals Go to Great Lengths to Fool the Police, But None of Their Tricks Is Successful

SINCE fingerprinting was officially adopted as a means of positive identification more than 50 years ago, it was perhaps inevitable that criminals would set themselves to work to defeat the system. Some did so for the simple purpose of escaping their own identity. Others used it for the more direct object of creating forgeries.

It may be well to state right at the outset that, while a forgery can be forged, no attempt has ever known been succeeded in changing the organs.

The simplest method of forging a fingerprint is by copying. From a mechanical standpoint, there are no real problems in making a mechanical reproduction of a print.

A British expert, Nigel Marwood, writing in the English magazine Detective refers to the case of a criminal who possessed, to a remarkable degree, the means of self-protection. This dangerous crook's fingers were just itching to get hold of considerable loot; the police have noted as a nearly after which provided very severe.

The only trouble was, he feared, even if he left no prints, the police would eventually suspect that he had had a hand in the matter. His long experience as a professional made his method and style of work quite familiar to the officers of the law. Finally, the crook's job here was not so much his own making by leaving no fingerprints as effort to leave a false trail BY LEAVING BEHIND SOMEONE ELSE'S FINGERPRINTS.

This sounds like a logical and feasible idea—but, as we mentioned above, the London was expensive—and let alone what he considered a foolproof plan. This is what he did.

He obtained a copy of the right index finger of an accompanying fellow criminal, imprisoned with index ink. From this he made a rubber stamp of the print, covered it with cloth, and then set out to commit his crime.

Wearing gloves, he proceeded to collect and pocket his loot. He then took the rubber stamp, and held it against his cheek until it was warm and damp. Finally, he pressed the stamp on the polished surface of a desk, where the police might eventually expect to find a fingerprint.

The police did find it took them almost an hour at all in possession of the result of a rubber stamp. Two lines gave it away. First of all, the pressure on the stamp had been the rubber lines (which represented the ridges of the fingerprint) in such a way that the impression appeared bluish.

The second flaw was due to the machine pushed up by the stamp when the criminal held it against his cheek. The machine gave the print a spring, uneven effect. Neither of these flaws is even present in a natural fingerprint.

The crook pressed right about one thing anyway. He had been sure that the police would almost automatically suspect him of the job they did. He was picked up the following day.

Michael's wife of still another criminal who lived the rubber stamp life. Instead of using the print of someone else, she was decided to create a wholly independent fingerprint. She happened to be an expert printer, and a keeper of real secrets.

When police were confronted with a couple of her marks, however, they almost died laughing. The one was most, but there were even more ridges per inch than there are in the fingerprint of a newborn baby. The second, the number of ridges falling within a rectangle is 15 to 16 for a newborn child, and 9 to 10 for an adult.

But what gave the police these laughable prints was the constant evidence of the "artist" who had left a number of ridges lower "in the cut" because he didn't know where to remove them, or how to remove them at all. Take a look at your own thumb under a magnifying glass, and you'll have some idea of the finger's dilemma.

There have been other attempts at this sort of thing, all equally as "unsuccessful." One hand has went to the trouble of preparing a pair of gloves on which that boy of late centuries of forged prints had been placed in the degree.

This device enabled the criminal to use the gloves hands as if they were normal hands—but the prints left looked as if they belonged to someone "out of the world."

Collectors have had also been used for purposes of forgery. Here, the user is back, sticky side down, as a printing fingerprint which has been left by someone other than the criminal. The print is picked up by the sticky substance, and when the criminal later brushes on it and then presses it on a bottle of mouth glass, a false but true copy of the original is left.

The criminal who showed this method was more than once that he had at last failed the system. But, eventually, the man didn't find the police any more than the others. In this instance, the police took one good look at the strange really substance that covered the print, and carefully noted, "this—nothing."

Taking to these prints, criminals have made some considerable attempts to show or otherwise their wits. But they haven't the least way that a fingerprint is identical as unchangeable as Rock. This was graphically demonstrated in the Laboratories de Police Technique, in Lyons, France, where the Edmond Locard, director, and similar experts subjected their fingers to boiling water, hot oil, and pressure in hot plates. Their fingerprints never changed.

One man is told of a only criminal who almost—but not quite—beat the fingerprint system. In this case, a series of prints had appeared when a fingerprint was always the carried on the same of the crime.

Careful examination of the print suggests that it came from the finger of a very tall man. For the print was large, and every inch showed it had been made in the natural way. In other words, it was a legitimate print.

Police have were alerted and a search indicated for a man, dropping the fact that some of the fingerprints indicated that only a small man would have used the prints of every. Quite by chance, a criminal was caught on the scene, just as he had been placed a burglary. The leading prosecution point was based on a fact that it didn't even resemble the print of the captured man, who only remained for the first five inches.

Just as the police began a second search for an accomplice, one scientific criminal got hold of an impression. He forced the criminal to pressure his thumb and index, and then proceeded to examine his last.

He found what he was looking for—the suspicious print was that of the last man's big toe!
